Chidori-gake
千鳥掛
The name Chidori-gake is taken from the little Chidori bird (plover, sandpiper). Chidori birds walk in a zigzag pattern, so stepping stone paths with an offset pattern are named after them.

The century-old garden of the Shinto priest house Nishimura-Ke has a short Chidori-gake stone path. There is a bigger stepping stone in the small stream running through the garden.

Left: Daihō-in, a sub-temple of Myōshin-ji in Kyoto.

右: Alternating stepping stones in the tea garden of the Tokyo National Museum

Gan-uchi 雁打
The literal translation is “flying geese strike”. A longer zigzag pattern, which is said to look like geese in flight.

If you like this,
visit us on our website:
www.japanesegardens.jp

like us on facebook:
www.facebook.com/RealJapaneseGardens

follow us on Pinterest:
pinterest.com/realjapangarden/

© 2013 by Niwashyu